1. There are many right-wing groups, each with different ideological beliefs. As ideologies become more extreme, groups tend to get smaller. In graph form, this looks like a long-tail curve with x-y asymptotes.

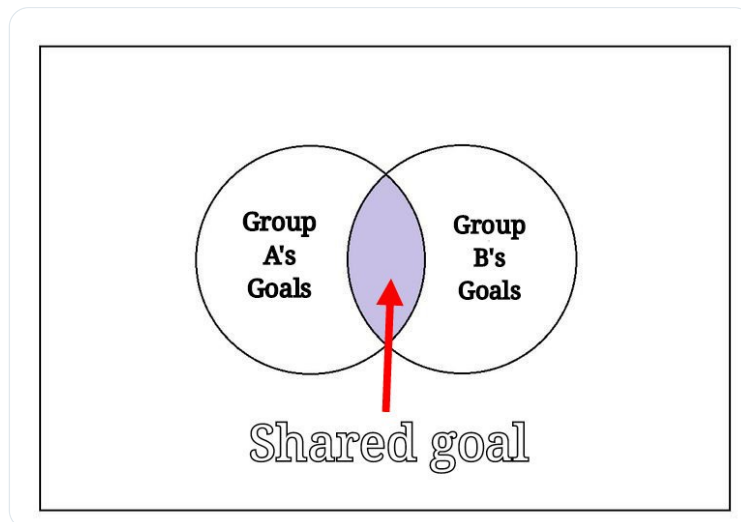

2. Understanding the ideologies of fellow right-wing groups can bolster cooperation between groups, make targeting more effective for recruitment, mitigate infighting over ideological differences, and help moderates find a group that aligns with their beliefs. Simplification 🙌

3. Each right-wing group has its own goals and some of these goals intersect. For example, Civic Nationalists (Civ Nats) and Conservatives both may want secure borders. As such, these groups can cooperate to accomplish this common goal.

4. Goals are reached through strategies, and strategies are executed through tactics. Trying a multitude of strategies and tactics helps reveal what works best and also mitigates predictability by the opposition. Organic growth and adaptability have been the Right's strengths.

5. Goals that are common between all right-wing groups have the highest probability of being accomplished due to inter-group cooperation. Thus, pursuing common goals expands the available inputs (i.e. more resources).

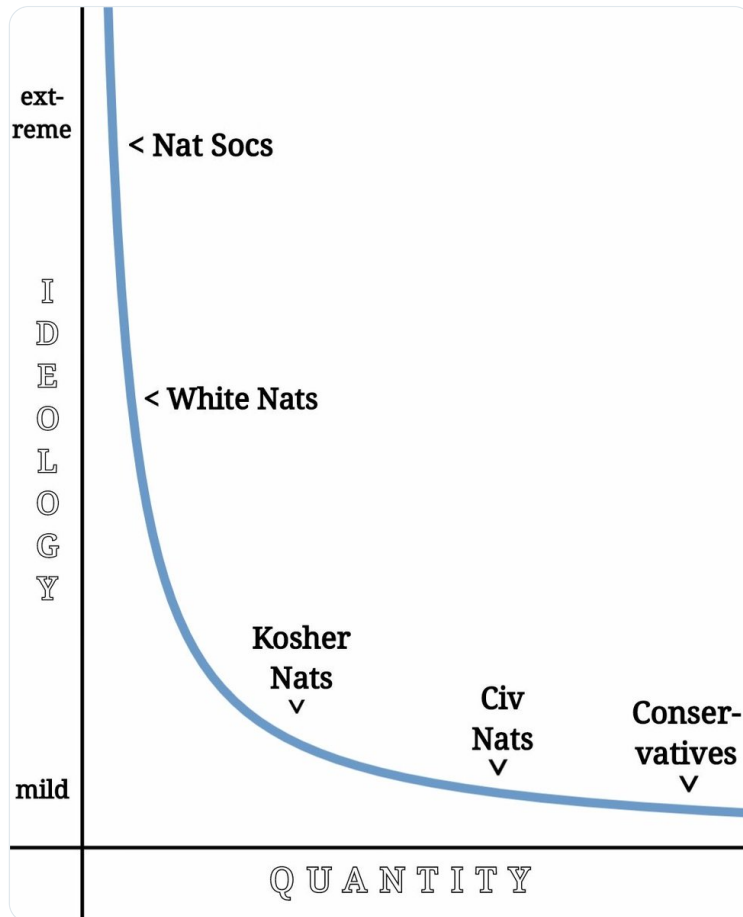

6. However, cooperation is sometimes stifled by infighting. Infighting comes in two forms: inter-group infighting over goals (a product of ideological differences) and intra-group infighting over which strategies and tactics should be employed to accomplish a group's goals.

7. For example, two Civ Nats may fight about the effectiveness of rallies (a dispute over tactics). This would be intra-group infighting.

A Nat Soc may fight a Civ Nat about inviting Jews to a Nationalist conference (an ideological dispute). This would be inter-group infighting.

8. Infighting with someone over optics may be moot if both parties have different ideological beliefs (e.g. a Nat Soc shouldn't expect a Civ Nat to endorse Swastikas).

9. Smaller groups further to the right on the ideological spectrum can grow their size by tapping recruits from larger groups that are to their ideological left. Although people have different vectors of entry, once crossing over, they are exposed to forces pulling them right.

10. As right-wingers continue to be pulled further right, standard Conservatism and Civic Nationalism start to look a little less menacing and moderate to the Left. This shifts the Overton Window the right of center and is beneficial to the entire Right. —
End.
